4. See also the fate of Hippias in 3.34. He was invited out for a parley on condition that if they couldn't agree he would be returned safely to his stronghold, placed in custody while the Athenians killed all his men, then released back into the fortification and immediately set upon and killed.
5. We might come a little closer if we assume that the "proper" in the Plataeans' second definition was intended as a restrictive rather than an intensive clause, but this is pure speculation and really doesn't resolve the contradiction.
